

Comes to Scarsdale

On April 25th, 1993, the March on Washington for Lesbian, Gay and Bi Equal Rights and Liberation saw an estimated 1 million people gather in Washington, D. C. Speakers and performers at the rally included the Indigo Girls, Melissa Etheridge, RuPaul, Nancy Pelosi, and Madonna.

Sydney Stern

A person is more than a trait

I went to Washington recently and had the good luck to be there during the dedication of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum and the march for gay rights. I wasn't able to get into the museum, but I did leave my convention early enough to watch the march for a while before I came home.

The entire weekend was a moving experience. As I watched the various participants in town for the dedication and the march, I could not stop thinking about the pain they had experienced. Yet at the same time I felt uplifted because both events attempted to promote tolerance by encouraging people to confront prejudice and its ugly effects.

When bigots judge people according to their race, religion, nationality or gender, they reduce the whole person to just that one characteristic. Sexuality is but one of every individual's many aspects, and a private one at that. There must be as great a variety of sex lives as there is of individuals, and I can't understand why homosexuality is singled out for special treatment.

Who knows what world leaders, generals or corporate executives do in the privacy of their bedrooms? If it is between consenting adults, who cares? Should shoe fetishists be able to serve at a government agency? Or as a banker? Should we employ the FBI, the CIA and Imelda Marcos to ferret them out so that we can sleep at night knowing that our records, public buildings and bank passbooks are

The first part of the gay march I saw included many veterans' groups. Men and women who served our country came from North Carolina, Georgia,

New England, San Diego, the service academies and nearly every place in between. Some carried flags. Some wore their uniforms. Many marched proudly and erectly. Others rolled by in wheelchairs.

After the vets came regional chapters of Act Up. I don't like Act Up because its members "out" people - reveal the alleged homosexuality of people who have chosen to keep their sex lives private. Many of them looked pretty bizarre; they are probably the ones conservative groups film to show people how weird homosexuals are. The marchers included topless women and crossdressing men (one wore a hat with a rubber chicken and red platform shoes). Their signs were obscene, angry, funny ("I Can't Even March Straight") and poignant ("I Am a Human Being").

The last section I saw included many chapters of PFLAG — Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays. One of the fathers wore a uniform and carried a sign that read, "World War II veteran." One of the mothers was in a wheelchair. The groups looked like a regional chapters of the PTA and Rotary Club.

The point, of course, is that homosexuals are people whose sexuality is different: it's not mainstream. But most of the people are. And most of them want their sexuality to be just a part of their lives, not the characteristic by which they are defined.

Some of them don't, it's true. Some of the demonstrators had an in-your-face attitude intended to annoy.

But that's the challenge. It's not very difficult to be tolerant when you approve of people. The tricky part is tolerating a group in spite of its obnoxious members instead of condemning it because of them. We don't have to like obnoxious people to be tolerant of the group to which they belong.

The Holocaust Memorial Museum examines bigotry on the grandest scale in history: institutionalized, systematized, and taken to its ultimate

The Nazis said the Jews, Poles, Jehovah's Witnesses, disabled people, gypsies, homosexuals are our inferiors—less than human. Following that logic, it was understandable that they should want to remove them from the schools, workplaces, neighborhoods.

Eventually these "inferior" groups' mere existence became so intolerable that the Nazis couldn't even bear to share their planet with them. That is when they took their bigotry to its chilling conclusion: genocide. They sought, simply and methodically, to execute those groups not like themselves.

I have always admired the Danes for their heroism during World War II. When the Nazis ordered them to force their Jewish citizens to wear yellow stars on their clothing, the entire Danish population sewed on yellow stars. If to be Jewish is a stigma, they said in effect, "Then we are all Jews,"

Their action embodied one of my favorite quotations, from John Donne:
"... any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in Mankinde; And therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; It tolls for thee."

Scarsdale Inquirer June 4th, 1993

Members of the Women's Issues Club of the Scarsdale High School attended the March, and upon their return mounted a poster campaign on behalf of LGBTQ+ rights. The campaign was initially halted by administration but was eventually allowed to move forward.

National March on Washington for Lesbian, Gay, and Bi Equal Rights and Liberation in front of the White House at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW, Washington DC on Sunday afternoon, 25 April 1993. By Elvert Barnes - 57.LGBT.MOW.25April1993, CC BY-SA 2.0, https://commons.wikimedia.org/w/index.php?curid=58384961

Scarsdale resident Sydney Stern was at the March and wrote about her experience in the Scarsdale Inquirer on June 4th, 1993.

Club brings gay rights message to SHS

By JACOB APPEL

From the Market Street parades in San Francisco to the Capitol Mall rallies in Washington, the gay rights movement is attracting attention around the nation — and Scarsdale High School is no exception. Members of the Women's Issues Club, after attending the March on Washington on April 25, have mounted a poster campaign on behalf of gay and lesbian rights.

The effort met an early snag when the assistant principal for student services, Michael McDermott, originally withheld permission to post material supporting gay rights.

While maintaining that he was not "pushing the issue under the table," McDermott said he felt that the "controversy surrounding the issue" and the potential for disruption of the educational process warranted a further investigation.

The tentative decision caused the Scarsdale High School newspaper, Maroon, to run an unsigned lead story entitled "Gay Rights Poster Compaign Halted: Administrators Reject Women's Issues Club Effort."

After meeting with the principal, Judy Fox; faculty members, and support personnel, McDermott decided to permit the posters with the provision that they not contain obscenities and that they provide information about a June 9th Woman's Issues Club forum to discuss the issue further. The assistant principal said the administration was "taking the initiative" and "attempting to approach the issue with sensitivity." With official permission, the posters were hung up for the first time on Wednesday, June 2.

The posters display such slogans as "I can't even think straight," "Cure Hate! Stop AIDS! Homophobia Kills!" and "End discrimination: Equal Rights for Gay Men and Lesbians." One poster depicts a red, white and blue Uncle Sam above the caption, "I want you to end the military ban." An ACT-UP flyer that contained profanity was the only poster administrators refused to permit. The posters are displayed in a locked glass case.

One social studies teacher, Rebecca Reimers, who is the advisor to the Women's Issues Club, said last week that the administration had "good reason" to act with caution. The poster controversy touches upon the much larger issue of "how to handle gay rights in the schools," she said.

Gay and lesbian issues are discussed as part of the tenth-grade health curriculum. The school government sponsored an AIDS-awareness forum in the fall.

Still some members of the school community would like to see gay culture and the contributions of gay men and women included in the social studies curriculum as well.

Ellen Cho, co-president of the Women's Issues Club, states that the posters are being displayed to raise awareness to gay and lesbian issues in the schools. She expressed the hope that "students will accept each other on their merits as human beings, not their sexual orientations."

While Scarsdale High School has made advances over recent years, it is not yet a comfortable environment for gay students. "It is upsetting to be a part of a school where there is such fear" of gays and lesbians, said Ilana Nossel, Women's Issues Club co-president.

Reimers notes that while she has not heard much negative reaction to the gay rights campaign, she generally "discusses the issue only with people who share her views." She suspects that there are probably a number of students and faculty members who are "absolutely apalled" by the posters, but that they have remained silent.

Last year, the House — the legislative arm of the school government — rejected a proposal to ban military recruitment on campus, despite the military's then discriminatory policy against homosexuals. The school handbook restricts discrimination by "sex, race or national origin" but does not address the issue of sexual orientation.

Experts argue over the percentage of homosexuals in the population, placing the number at anywhere between one and 10 percent. Even using the conservative figure of two percent produces approximately twenty-five gay students in the 1200-member student body, a number that exceeds both the African-American and Hispanic populations of the high

For now, the posters will remain on display, but no further discussion is planned until the fall. "We ought to address the issue with full sensitivity—not just by putting up posters," McDermott said.

Scarsdale Inquirer June 18th, 1993

MA: Jala Cabaal

The issue of LGBTQ+ rights re-emerged in the spring of 1996. Louise Wollman published a series of three articles in the Scarsdale Inquirer, focusing on the experiences of LGBTQ+ students at the Scarsdale High School.

When parents need help in coming out of the closet

By LOUISE WOLLMAN

"Certain things are given: My son is gay and I'm short," Lorraine Weber told an audience at the Mid-Westchester YM-YWHA in Scarsdale recently. But that kind of acceptance and equanimity doesn't— and didn't — fall into place with the ease this matter-of-fact presentation suggested.

While gay children build walls of pretense around themselves to hide from their terror of parental rejection, so too do their parents build walls of denial to keep at bay the knowledge or fear their child is gay. Even when that reality is forced on them, they can disappear behind new barriers of negation.

"When a child comes out of the closet, the parent very often goes in," is how members of the support group, Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays (P-FLAG) put it.

Not in my house Weber, a counselor in the White Plains Middle school and a teacher, somehow missed the telltale signs — isolation, depression, lack of interest in the opposite sex, signs she would have recognized in any other high school teenager — in her own

graduate-level human relations

Later, when Mark, then in his early 20s, came out to her en route to a family wedding, she was again floored by her reaction. Despite her flamboyant bohemian stance and scores of gay friends, "Suddenly, when it was at my own front door, it became 'not in my house.' Today I say, 'If people are gay it might as well be my house."

Between those extremes came four years of silence and fear of how she, this expert in human interaction, would be perceived. "I was stuck in my own selfish self-image. Then one day, leading a support group, I said, 'I need a support group of my own — my son is gay' and 25 people did not fall through the floor."

Eventually, she watched Mark's ried woman with three sons and an active member of one local conservative temple, was shunned by former friends and temple members who "closed ranks" when she

"I took the risk to say, 'We kids. Those of you who have young children don't know yet whether they're straight or gay. It's important for you to look at that while you're

If one in 10 people is homosexual,

Jacobs said when a child dies of AIDS, parents endure double or triple pain: losing their child, compounded by having kept it all secret. And frequently they suffer the community's stigmatization or outright rejection of the gay lifestyle, bearing this too in Unsure, unsteady, many parents isolate themselves for years, which then one in four has a gay or lesbian want you,' and I hope risks will be taken by all of us," Ferris said.

"You have to try us."

busy judging."

chosen, then . . .

in the extended family.

lover, Howard, showering him with unconditional love, and realized, "What more could I want for my son?" Last June, up in rock-ribbed, conservative New Hampshire terrain where the two men live, there was a lovely commitment ceremony — witnessed by many locals happy to be on the invita-

"It's a journey, not just a happy tale," Weber finished.

In these houses

There were other happy — and sad — tales told at the March meeting, convened by the Y and Jewish Women International (JWI) to explore how synagogues could put out welcome mats to gays and lesbians. Weber sat on the panel, along with a rabbi, a gay, a lesbian and a therapist.

"From the evaluation forms people returned, we see a need and a desire for ongoing follow-up programs," said Renee Krutoff, JWI Northeast region director. Sponsors were astonished and pleased at the hefty turnout of 80 or more people of many religions, among them gays and lesbians of all ages, religious leaders from different faiths and parents of homosexual children.

It was a public meeting that turned

"I am the grandmother of a child born to my gay daughter," shared "Fran," a local art dealer with a large Scarsdale clientele, who confessed afterwards to years of pretending she accepted her daughter's sexuality. "I always secretly hoped if she resolved the bitterness with her father she would become straight."

Despite one interfaith and one interracial marriage already among her children, Fran told the audience a baby in a same-sex union threw her completely.

"I went to the rabbi and expressed all my fears. She said one simple, 'Don't worry. This child will be a blessing.' I took her literally and you know what?— this baby was a real healing. It put our family back together again as a unit. My ex-husband, who hadn't visited "Ellen" in the seven years since he found out she was gay, has been there and is the most doting grandfather ever. And his mother, who strongly disapproved, was knitting afghans by the end. Then, when the baby was named in the synagogue we had this unbelievable outpouring of community support, which was incredibly healing and benefi-

In Westchester?

"Being gay is a piece of cake in New York City. I can't believe I'm saying this here in Westchester, where I have always wished I could stand up as a gay man" said a tall, imposing, 40-ish businessman-type, his voice choked with both wonder and long unexpressed anguish. "I am blown away that this is taking place here. Just to be surrounded by well-dressed, Continued on page 12 gay bashing in his 28-plus years on the force. Nor do high school students interviewed remember any such violence. On the other hand, research by

When parents need help in coming out of the closet

Continued from page I middle-aged Jewish women who could be my mother . . . Eleven years ago I told my parents and we still don't talk about it." It can take that long and longer.

though it doesn't have to. Along the path to acceptance, parents ride rivers of tears, peer into hollow canyons strewn with their crumbled dreams. They move through all the stages associated with dying or losing a loved one - denial, anger,

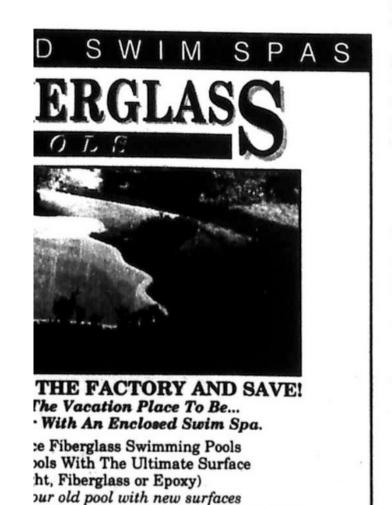

"I wish I could say I had the same reaction my husband did when my daughter, who was terribly frightened we would abandon her, came out to us," said "Helen," a 27-year resident, speaking anonymously because hers is a prominent Scarsdale face. "He said, 'Don't worry about it, we accept you and love you for what you are. He meant it — he deals with serious illness daily. Her sister and brother could have cared less. Me, completely went to pieces." A helpful psychiatrist told her she had to go through a period of mourning because the child she thought she had was dead. She would have to reacquaint herself with this new child all over again. Helen found the White Plains P-FLAG meetings even more comforting than therapy. "You go there not for people to say, 'I understand, but to hear people say, 'I lived Today, eight years later, she is still active in P-FLAG, attends meetings to help others, writes letters and lobbies to change the laws. While Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey and Vermont have laws extending civil rights to gays, New York, which has had one on the table for 21 years, is among 41

An onion of an event "Coming out is not a single event - it's a lifelong process that hapother states that do not.

ersize Pool 8-1/2'x14'

pa 8'x14' $5,000

able) In-ground or above $6500

icks, Stains, Algae . Less Chemicals

m Enclosure Available . Affordable or Brochure 800-532-POOL

Making stands, taking chances "Here's my coming-out story," clear she and her partner were her lover, for many years a mar-

unwelcome. "I am not going to be rejected by a Jewish community said an attractive red-headed woman at the YM-YWHA of Mid-West-chester's March 13 forum. "I was the prototypical oldest child. My brother and sister walked rockier roads. I was financially responsible, had a good job, a stable, loving relationship. you told me you valued." The meeting was the perfect place for her to express sorrow that in July her temple had made it pens internally and externally, at many different times, to many different people, in layers," said Maxine

Gold, a therapist who works fredifferent than it is for their child,

explained 33-year-old panelist Randi

Sperber, who knew by ninth grade

she was gay, but couldn't acknowledge it even to herself until age 25.

For a while it took all her parents'

courage to say something when mother comes out to someone she says it has to be the right time, the right place, she has to feel comfortable with the person . . . It's exactly the same for me: the lighting has to be just right, it even has to be a

Chinese restaurant — maybe that's because I'm Jewish," Sperber giggled, her joke a testament to the pos-

For Sperber, telling her parents assumed the proportions of "jumping off a mountain." Their only child few trusted friends.

sibility of healing.

Coming out for parents is not that quently with gays and their parents.

feel invited as a gay person.'

Grandma, it'll kill her."

After that, she told a therapist, then a them may well be about one's own friends told gay jokes. "Before my would never have a big wedding. never have grandchildren, she agonized for them in advance. Though they cried and blamed themselves for failing her, questioned what they'd done wrong, they nevertheless professed their love and support. Then all three retreated to their own safe corners for two years.

'You carry it now' "When your child comes out, it gives them a great sense of relief. But now you have to deal with it, said Gold. "Their expectation is you're instantly able to accept.' Parents have their chaotic reac-

There is fear — "what will happen to my child, to me? Will I lose my child to the homosexual communi-There is denial, though Gold said putting it off to deal with another day Some take it very personally, feel tremendous anger and ask, "How could you do this to me?" or "Why couldn't you have told me you have cancer instead?" Some parents get beyond this, others do not, like the Treblinka survivors one therapist in the audience described. Their son my journey to find a congregation Helen Ferris, rabbi at Temple Israel of Northern Westchester in Randi Sperber, a lesbian pan- Croton, has publically and unilat-I just refused to be rejected. I told elist, who plans to have a baby in erally welcomed gays into her conthem, 'I am doing all the things the next few years, said "I always gregation.

either, when I am doing all the things that make a good Jew. We in the gay community have to do our piece, too. I consider it part of feel welcome as a Jew, but I don't know as a gay person. I need to One woman told the group that suffering but she encouraged him to overcome his own victim mentality. Not only did they reject him, they accused him of being a traitor to his people: if 6 million Jews perished in the Holocaust then his responsibility was to continue the lineage. Some parents warn, "Don't tell

"Nobody's ever too old to tell," declared gay panelist Richard Wortman, who for years lied, it turned out unnecessarily, to his grandmother. He believes "protecting

Parents of homosexual children also face what seems to them, sometimes rightly, sometimes not, towering family and community judgment. "Our little neck of Westchester is a particularly painful place for parents to confront their peers," said Richard Jacobs, rabbi of Westchester Reform Temple, in a telephone interview. "To find out a child is gay or lesbian has more of a stigma here because we're a fairly traditional community — which, by the way, is also one of our strengths. A place with a lot of families with moms and dads and children living 'the American Dream,' can be wonderful, unless you're one of us who don't quite fit into that model and then you feel particularly excluded."

Weber described someone speaking recently at a temple who said, "It's important for you to know that primarily straight people have gay

A nice Jewish boy Richard Wortman, a Manhattan lawyer active in both gay and Jewish causes, recalls coming out to his liberal Woodmere parents, former Freedom Riders in the South and Vietnam protesters in Washington. "My mother didn't Hanukkah cards on the piano talk to me for 10 years. My father said, 'Tell me something I didn't was a remarkable moment: they know already." Though things eased up some- and after the tears had flowed what over time, relations were nevertheless strained until Christmas, not Hanukkah) lunch. "I wasn't going to flaunt my lifestyle, but wasn't going to clean it up it either to give them false impressions. There were literally hundreds of Christmas and some even sexually explicit. It clearly got it that this is who I am fairly copiously for a while, my mother said, 'Let's get with the program - you need to have ment for Christmas (yes someone good in your life.

happy," he continued, "and if he would say, 'I'm happy,' then I'd be happy. But when he sits on the bed and says, 'Why me? Why do I have to be gay? Just let me be who I am, it breaks your heart.'

Forward strides "How can anyone grow up a whole person if he's thought of as a pariah? To expect an individual to be like other individuals when he wasn't made that way is cruel and unusual punishment," declared 35-year resident Jean Wentworth, whose son, Jonathan, would have been 40 this year, had he not died of AIDS two years ago. Wentworth considers Jonathan among the fortunate few, always completely comfortable with saying this, if I could have had him be heterosexual instead of homosexual. I wouldn't have - because then he would have been someone else. Not better and not worse — he would have been a different person and there was no one quite like Jonathan." "I lost my child. I would have given anything to hold on to him, gay or otherwise," said Deana Schwam-Mucaro, at the Scarsdale library. Her son, Todd, studying to be a concert conductor, died of AIDS at 28. "I wish parents could try to be more accepting of their children."

"I've realized, especially since

Jonathan's death, and I'm honestly

Gold declared unfair to the key people in their lives, denying them the opportunity to be support networks. "Fred" and his wife "Carol" are one such couple. Their son, "Greg" has been out to them for almost three years. While unable to speak of it to family and friends, they did find solace at the Norwalk P-FLAG. "At the end of Greg's freshman year, we were riding on the Hutch when he said, 'I think I'm gay,'" Fred, a sales executive, recalled. "His mother nearly crashed the car," then spent the next few years being sick: trouble with her back and shoulders, stomach problems and chest pains. "No," said somewhat defensively, "I said, 'If this is the course you've

"'Hold it, Dad,' he said. 'This is not a path I've chosen. I don't want to be this way. It's just the way it is.' Fred vowed to find a support group — but not close to home.

lousy parade," he said to the Y audience, shaking his head regretfully but [This is the first of two articles exploring personal attitudes and community responses to gays and les-there," he said.

To date, Fred has, with great sadness, accepted his son and has come this far: He attended the Y meeting openly and, this winter, tried to start a Scarsdale P-FLAG chapter. In four months of meetings, one person showed up. He never returned. And yet, said Marjorie, "you'd be shocked how many Scarsdale parents come to White Plains P-FLAG - and at who they are." "I've reached the point where I want to educate the community," said Fred. "People have got to understand that gays live nice, respectable lifestyles - they don't walk around with their 'you-know-whats hanging

"I don't announce that I'm the parent of a gay child, any more than anybody walks up to a friend and says, 'Hi, I'm homophobic.' This is a private situation. I'm not ready to march in a gay pride parade yet. Would that he could, a parent like Poughkeepsie Rabbi Stephen Arnold would say. "My kid never thanked me as deeply for anything I've done for her — not even for four years of college. Just for showing up at a waving a white T-shirt proudly, "I'm straight, but I'm not narrow;" it read. "It's the biggest high and the biggest low I get. A high, as I walk by the kids, all crying and cheering and hugging me. A low because what are all those tears about? I feel like I'm standing in for thousands."

Scarsdale Inquirer, April 12, 1996

Richard invited them to his apart-

Hiding out at Scarsdale High School

By LOUISE WOLLMAN He's only out of Scarsdale High School one year but already he can't wait for his 10th reunion.

Not to reconnect gleefully with old friends who have somehow drifted away nor to return in triumph as a corporate success, but to get symbolic closure on those painful years when living with a secret consumed his life. He can hardly wait because he heard this prediction from one of his college professors: "Just wait and see, you'll go back to your 10th reunion and find out the two most homophobic, girl-chasing, gung-ho, macho football stars were actually dating each other." "I have specific people in mind and I'm waiting for that moment, to say, 'Hey, you were so homophobic you kept me in the closet!' It will be mind-boggling to see just who has their gay lover in tow.'

Call him John, though it's not his name. These days, he's quite up front about his sexuality, but his parents prefer it kept quiet. At least for now. Scarsdale was not a pleasant place to grow up in for someone who was beginning to think he preferred guys to girls. "The fact that I wasn't comfortable talking about my own sexuality until around May of senior year is an indication of the environment

Sticks and stones "Generally I do not see a lot of acceptance at all for gays and lesbians," said Melissa Sontag, president of the Women's Issues Club. "A lot of people are openly homophobic, but mostly it's just comments, like if a guy is into drama someone might say,

'Oh, I thought he was a fag.' I do Donald Ferraro recalls no incidents of know of one openly gay student and I know two years ago there was one girl in the Women's Issues Club who was openly gay, but that's it." The fear teens suffer is almost primal. A March 1993 national survey of 1,632 eighth to 11th-grade students sponsored by the American Association of University Women Educational Foundation found that 86 percent of all students would be "very

Dr. Anthony D'Augelli, a clinical psychologist on the faculty of Pennsylvania State University, on youth who identify themselves as GLB — gay, lesbian, bisexual found 79 percent did not report all victimization incidents.

"Scarsdale was not a pleasant place to grow up in for someone who was beginning to think he preferred guys to girls."

upset" if they were called gay or lesbian: 85 percent of boys and 87 per-Indeed, it seems boys would rather be beaten up than be branded a "fag." No other type of harassment including actual physical abuse provoked a reaction this strong among boys. Yet in terms of their actual experience, only 17 percent said they had been called gay or lesbian. Boys (23 percent) were more than twice as likely as girls (10 percent) to have been victimized in this kind of verbal abuse, but Police Chief

Eighty percent of GLB youth report severe isolation: social - having no one to talk to; emotional — feeling distanced from family and peers; and cognitive — lacking in

I was dealing with so many other problems feeling comfortable and you can't share at home, potentially

"That shows you the context in which young people are trying to get their homework done," said Rea Carey, executive director of the National Advocacy Coalition on Youth and Sexual Orientation. Homosexual students here face this

"Scarsdale is not like other schools where you get beaten up or harassed constantly, but at the same time, no one from my grade is out that I know of and that makes me question within a grade of 250 people - no

Supportive and not

Homophobia hurts straight kids as well. A boy can't have "feminine" qualities without being stereotyped or called a name; a girl is "outed" and, guilt by association, all her friends are typecast. Or, they simply drop her and suffer their own private guilt. Added to this is fear and insecurity, plus plain garden-variety ignorance. "Some of our students have a very difficult time talking about homosexuality," said Linda Prendergast, district coordinator of health. "A student may worry, 'If I'm with someone years ago and has had involvements with men and women. "In general when you talked one-on-one, most people's homophobia stemmed from not enough information rather than just blatant hatred," Jessica said. She considered herself "relatively out" at SHS but not out enough that random people could stop and harass her. She didn't feel pressured into being straight or acting "normal" like some of her friends who were "really scared about talking about their sexual orientation and felt there was no place for it, even in the Alternative School." But attesting eloquently to the general climate in the high school is the fact that Jessica, who, like John, freely discusses her sexual orientation homosexual, when will they come on to me, and what would I do?' and there's a kind of gut level, not intellectual, feeling that 'this is contawas both supportive and not at all,"

said "Jessica," who graduated two

"When I was there the high school

gious: I could catch this too."

in most situations, wants her real name concealed to protect her younger sibling. GLB students suffered, Jessica believes, from a pervasive attitude of heterosexism, which "can be very scary to people dealing with their sexual orientation because if they want to talk about it, they have to bring it up and that takes a lot of guts. So, if people didn't make assumptions, if they talked about who they were attracted to, it would make it so much easier than if they just assumed it was the opposite sex.' There were also blatant instances of homophobia, she reported — like the Continued on page 14

Hiding out at Scarsdale High School: teenagers cope with homosexuality

sexuality and, according to the report

girls who came out then and there.

of a participant, one boy and two

Researching the environments

homosexuals face, D'Augelli of Penn

State interviewed a younger populaas a funny derogatory joke, or the accused of being homosexual, several the culture. kids who talked about not wanting to who admitted to questioning their be in the same building with speakers at AIDS and HIV forums. "Some of [the students'] attitudes echo their parents or the media, some of what they say may be what they think or what they think they should say or it may even be a cover-up," Prendergast observed. Some gay kids themselves play-act at homophobia as self-protection. "In self-hatred the societal messages that they are unacceptable or deviant or It's OK but it's not Youth outreach counselor Stephen Hartman describes the atmosphere at SHS as a kind of "liberal homophobia, a general attitude of tolerance, as in 'It's really all right with me as long as they don't do it in front of me' and for some kids that makes them feel all the more invisible." "Scarsdale people try to intellectually bullshit the issue and present this facade of acceptance and open-mindedness," said John. The subject provoked frank discussion, some heat and controversy during this year's Junior Health Fair. Hartman, who wrote his Ph.D. dissertation on the disclosure of sexual identity and, in particular, the telling of coming-out stories, presented a sexual orientation workshop during which he aired an MTV video featuring a same-sex couple and he led an exercise demonstrating just how charged even so-called neutral words The agenda provoked a range of reactions from anger to unrest. "Some kids felt they were really open to one another and had an attitude of 'it's no big deal' while others felt persecuted and said, 'If this is an open environment, it comes as a surprise to me," Hartman observed. "To me it demonstrated how diverse the perceptions are among kids about both what sexual orientation is and what it's like to question your sexual orientation and it demonstrated how challenging it is to have doubts about yourself you can't share easily."

tion than had previously been studied useful information about sexuality and discovered that the average age and, in particular, homosexuality. The result is a higher incidence of of coming out has fallen. D'Augelli describes the term "coming out" as substance abuse and greater numbers less a single event than a process. Nowadays, on average, a child first becomes aware of somehow being completed suicides — 30 percent of different at age 10 to 12, annual youth suicides are estimated for me was creating this kind of "self-labels" at 15, makes a first disto be committed by GLB youth, said homophobic air so I could be accept- closure to a friend, teacher, counselor a 1989 U.S. Department of Health lars to avoid being taunted or teased. or advisor at 16 and tells a parent at and Human Services report. Or their homophobia is real 18. The four-year average lag "In some ways it may be even pressure-cooker communities, more led a support group for four lesbian attitudes toward homosexuality and because they have internalized as between first awareness and harder for kids that come from some- will suffer the golden child syn- Scarsdale girls at the Scarsdale bisexuality.] In interviewing "John," now a sophomore at a prestigious Eastern liberal arts college, I asked to him to answer three questions: "What is it "Boys and Sex"... I really felt alone edly normal, but how come no one out] other people as well, people who vate, what we share. It's all connect-like being in high school here while but not so much [in] pain perhaps talked about it? I remember wanting. I was relatively close to, had gone ed. hiding out in the closet? How did it because I wasn't willing to fully wanting, wanting to tell my advisor through some of the same questioning feel to be out? And what would you admit things to myself. My diary want to say to other kids who might entries would be like, "Well, maybe be hiding out? He needed a weekend I'm gay . . . Anyway . . . " to sort things out before he came up with an eloquent chronicle, six pages things, emotional, etc. I was having I thank him for myself and on behalf of all of you readers for his candidness, his clarity, his courage something anti-Semitic someone said, "Well, Bob called John a fruit." If relationship was only known by our values? My last two last years of high the most comforting and welcoming school [were] a series of landmarks environment, where can you share on the journey to coming out. At the something like that? . . . Imagine same time, I shy away from such ter- going through dealing with things at on a self-identity exploration project, I minology and glorification of a home, dealing with typical teenage painful and frustrating process. What issues of having tests upon tests, went through in high school was wanting to get away, wanting to go places on the weekend, wanting to It doesn't seem like it was really an just . . . run away from everything issue until my junior year, when, in [and] on top of that, you've got this my diary, I started exploring the possibility that I might be gay. I had through your head. I think that had I when, on paper, for myself, I was able hellish. sion, even with those I was fooling around with were thinking, sharing during this time turned in to Tell and bisexual students is important, and to human as anyone else, no matter what around with. The only thing I was and lying about. I think that I was Tell where I would let them know make people realize that we live a life, degrading comments people may say able to do was look at the section looking for some sort of validation. something taboo and they would too. not a lifestyle, I want to create an in the halls, in the cafeteria, no matter titled "Homosexuality" in a copy of OK, so experimentation was suppos- [It was] incredibly important [to find openness about sexual issues . . . peri- what people assume, you are OK!

Among the 25 students present a self-labeling is, in part, a function of what privileged backgrounds like drome: They excel at everything to Family Counseling Service offices few were already out, some had been the general homophobic messages in Scarsdale," said Jill Schreibman, compensate for being, even as they and said "It was very hard for them director of Center Lane, the White hide, major parental disappointments. in this atmosphere, which didn't Plains community center for gay Consuming themselves with school- encourage openness, and they pre-youth, which was initially funded Some kids do poorly at school, cutting classes, shunning extracurricu-

Living a lie, then leaving it behind went through from the periphery.

with my faculty advisor, I decided to no idea!

let lies go and came to honesty while about my confusion . . . to let it out. I I had work and sports, there's also no need ferred to keep it a secret from most with a $75,000 grant from former to explain why they have no social people in their lives. Not one had Dobkin, whose daughter did not Or, they can even hide by leading a But John sees dramatic and posicome out until junior year of college. frantic social life. One Scarsdale partive change in the community in the "Once I knew, I was shocked in ret- ent recalls, "Our older daughter was one year since he graduated. A work rospect to see there were no services blonde and feminine, but once she shop where some kids were comfortfor adolescents," said Barbara went off to college we never heard a able and others not is "a huge step Dobkin. "So many kids who went to boy mentioned. Same when she went forward, WOW!" he said. And then, school with my kids are now out as on to graduate school. We just not two months later, "in Scarsdale, gay and lesbians and yet there is no assumed she was going out with a where sexuality is so rarely disdiscussion and no role models for the married man. It never occurred to us cussed, a front-page article [on local she was a lesbian. We even paid for parents of gay children], it blew me one of those dating services so she away!" Two years ago Ann Rosen, the Second of a three-part series on Alternatively, in upscale, other high school outreach worker, personal responses and community

od. Because that is tied into how we act as teenagers, young adults, what our values are, what we consider pri-

For those out there going through The end of senior year and much of the same thing Senior year I met someone who my beginning time at college found admitted to me about having the same me in a frenzy of "What am I?" I to question oneself about one of the experiences I had had. I wasn't alone went through a time where I felt I had most taboo subjects in our society. anymore. Sure, I had read about all to label myself. That I was either gay [Try to] realize you're really not open about my life at home. I could these things, but to hear another per- or straight . . . Now, because of many, alone . . . My biggest suggestion — something racist that someone did, son with a statistic. I ended up enter-friends, strangers, parents, etc., and concretely admit things to yourself. ing a relationship with this person [an especially being in the college envi- Where you can freely explore things, and his powerful commitment to other but that was IT. I wasn't going to SHS schoolmate]. It was real, intense ronment, the shift has gone from but get them off your mind. The other come home one day and be like, and emotional. The real extent of our being "What am I?" to "What are my thing? Find someone you can talk to! closest friends, and even they could Questionnaires [I was handing out your youth counselor or anyone. And only observe the growth the two of us for my project also] allowed me to realize . . . there are places you can go gain a sense of Scarsdale High to! Organizations exist for the issues During Senior Options, in working School's own homophobia and you might be dealing with! But say assumptions. [Since then] I've also only what you're comfortable saying! was told by a youth counselor that learned that A LOT of my stereotypes I'm not here to out anyone. Don't talk part of understanding teenage male about who's gay, who's straight are to someone you don't trust. A lot of identity is to look at sexuality. wrong, wrong, wrong. I mean this damage could come out of one mis-Something clicked. When meeting when I say it — quite often you have placed comment, depending on how I want to come back to SHS and talking to her. And what a sense of change the environment. Sexuality . A lot of it really has to do with selfrelief! She accepted it, didn't harp on isn't something I can just come to confidence in general. You really already had a number of homosexual been definitively gay, during that par- it, and that was that! The process of terms with and then leave. It involves have to learn to believe in yourself, encounters, but this was the first time ticular year, things would have been happiness continued, as hinting things going back and healing . . . What am I and to find your convictions. almost became an addiction. I became trying to achieve? As much as creat- Determine how much of your personto admit my attraction to other men . . Junior year was looking around and fascinated by other people's experi- ing an open-minded and accepting al life you really want to share. You I felt I couldn't discuss this confu- wondering what the guys I had fooled ences as well. Many conversations environment for gay/lesbian and just need to realize that you are just as possibly come home and talk about son say they had done them put a per- many, many conversations with get a diary, something where you can you respond to people fearing and

Scarsdale Inquirer, May 24, 1996

SHS — taking on the rights and realities of gay students

By LOUISE WOLLMAN

This is the third in a series on community attitudes toward homosexuality.

Seems the high school, too, is coming out of the closet. The shame and isolation gay, lesbian and bisexual students feel, their constant fear of hearing the slang words that cut to the quick, or worse, the threat of exposure they face daily - their chronic lack of safety - has not been seen as an issue either policy makers or curricula should be addressing. But, lately, teachers, counselors, parents and kids themselves have been suggesting this hands-off policy should change and the administration has shown signs it is listening.

Cloaked in denial "I always felt there had to be something that made her push herself to almost kill herself," said one Scarsdale mother recently. Her daughter, now 36, drove her body mercilessly in high school, denying it food but driving it to excess at sports. All to avoid telling herself, her parents and her schoolmates until age 28 — that she prefers women

Conversely, there are those at Scarsdale High School who are in touch with their homosexuality and "are experiencing a lot of inner pain because they're not able to openly talk about something that's on the forefront of their minds," said John, a 19-year-old gay college student who grew up in Edgewood. "A couple of years ago I thought the issue of gays and lesbians was coming up with the kids, but then it seemed to die down. Myself and a couple of other people don't want it to die," said Dr. Ernest Collabolletta, a Spanish teacher and one of the school psychologists.

That impenetrable shroud of denial camoflaging a very real population is slowly being shed.

"If the statistics are true that 10 percent of the world is homosexual, that would mean we have about 120 kids who might be gay, lesbian or bisexual (GLB). Our goal as educators should be to see what we can do for this popula-

Compounding the stickiness of raising a subject like sexual orientation is the fact that there are few existing policies, guidelines, training materials or curricula in place, not here nor virtually anywhere in the country. One ray of hope is a brand new book called "Free Your Mind," a readable story- and interview-laden resource guide for GLB youth, their families, teachers, counselors and friends. By Ellen Bass and Kate Kaufman, it both affirms and it Collabolletta, along with Dr. Stephen Hartman, one of the high school youth outreach workers, have been prime forces for change. Collabolletta maintains that teachers are uncomfortable about connecting with gay youth or protecting them from peers. Hartman encourages more formal arenas where kids can discuss sexual orientation to combat peer prejudice and ignorance. "Sexuality is not a neutral topic even broaching the subject is generally seen as identifying oneself as gay or lesbian, so the more opportunity we offer to broach it, the less scary it is," he said. Hartman's co-youth outreach worker Ann Rosen agrees: "I would love to see more schoolwide education because I think people - students and teachers — are not as aware as they think of their prejudices and homophobia, but at some level it exists."

Raise the subject of how homosexuality has been dealt with at Scarsdale High School and virtually everybody brings up the time two years ago when members of the Women's Issues Club mounted posters in support of National Coming Out Day and were ordered to remove them by assistant principal Michael McDermott.

Eventually an accord was reached and most of the posters were displayed, but the impression remains that the administration is skittish about this sub-

A staff member, speaking only on condition of anonymity, confirms: "Sexuality is a taboo subject in Scarsdale High School. The school administration is particularly anxious - even the discussion of straight sex is not tolerated." "I got the feeling they were trying to be supportive, but I feel like they have a lot of pressure to not offend people, the parents, the taxpayers. It seemed like they would rather not have had to deal with the issue," said "Jessica," one of the club members involved, now a college sophomore. Her name is changed to protect her sibling. "It was strident literature that was not an attempt to educate but rather was just politically aggressive," argued Dr. Judith Fox, the high school principal.

"Mainly what it came down to was they felt the posters were an invasion of students' space — that students who were in the closet or scared about their sexuality would feel threatened," said Jessica, who sometimes calls herself

"What tends to happen is discussion of alternative sexualities have positive effects, even on kids who are in the mainstream."

-- Dr. Stephen Hartman

bisexual but generally prefers the inclusive - though to those outside her generation, discordant - term 'queer.' "But saying students aren't ready to deal with it is circular reasoning: Those students aren't ready to deal with their own sexuality because there isn't a safe space to deal with it, and that's because of the homophobia and the stereotypes. But the reason there's homophobia and hatred is because the issues are not being dealt with."

Teach what?

"With sensitive issues like sexuality, very personal issues, there is a line and it's hard to know when a public institution crosses it in terms of intruding on kids' privacy. I like to think we strike a balance," Fox said. "I have a concern about bringing in a formal program based on encouraging kids to reveal elements of their lives."

"I wouldn't feel comfortable about a health class which went around and asked people to define their sexual orientation," Jessica counters, "but I think there's a huge range between that and maybe a forum where there's a space to talk about how people feel about sexual orientation in general, how they feel the climate is in the school and how they feel about their own homophobia. Like, 'I feel very uncomfortable seeing two women walking down the hall holding hands' - that needs to be talked about somewhere." Jessica believes school is the right place because many kids can't bring it up at home.

Indeed, pioneer research from Penn State clinical psychologist Dr. Anthony D'Augelli indicates that kids first come out to their parents some two years after they tell a friend or counselor.

"John," who would like to return to the high school and participate in whatever program is developed, believes students are too immature and would be too embarrassed by a schoolwide forum. He favors a very personalized mini-program where a health class might break into small sessions of 10 to 12, run by someone like Hartman, and students might be sensitized, for example, to what it's like to live a lie. "If you can make one person think about something they may not think about normally, whether about how they treat themselves or how they treat other people, you've done incredible good." Hartman himself believes all kids would benefit from open discussions. "Kids are always thinking about this. Even straight kids who have no homosexual thoughts and fantasies have to determine their attitudes about sexuality - is a guy sensitive or macho, for example, and there's no place to discuss this. What tends to happen is discussion of alternative sexualities have positive effects, even on kids who are in the mainstream." Beyond that, straight kids will encounter homosexuals throughout their lives: They may have lesbian relatives or bisexual teachers, they may someday supervise — or be supervised by someone who is gay.

Teaching the teachers One Fox Meadow mother of a lesbian daughter, who is certain her job would be in jeopardy should she identify herself, believes, "homophobia is here to stay unless we educate children early on, with books like Heather Has Two Mommies." She proposes a committee - "you know how Scarsdale loves a committee" of parents, deans, principals and health teachers to work together to produce a school program "that would present homosexuality as a normal part of life, not as a deviant lifestyle but as a sexual orientation from birth."

Believing the first step would be to educate the educators, in late winter Collabolletta proposed that his friend Dan Woog speak on homophobia at a faculty meeting Woog, a Westport High School soccer coach, authored "School's Out," in which he describes his experience as a closeted high school student and his coming out as a gay teacher. "He was impressive, this guy," said

Fox April 16, the day after Woog spoke. He wasn't a proselytizer and he wasn't threatening, accusatory or threatening, she added. The soccer coach said he presented teachers with the idea that confronting homophobia and incorporating homosexuality down into the very substructure of the curriculum should be viewed not as a moral imperative but as a school safety issue.

"His premise was it is our obligation to make school a safe place, not for 90 percent of students but for everyone," continued the principal, promising to continue the discussion in cabinet.

Woog talked about "homo-ignorance," the idea that other minorities blacks, Hispanics, Asians, even the hearing-impaired or the wheelchairbound — are visible and can be made to feel safe in the classroom. But a teacher might teach 30 years, have 3,000 students, and never know one was gay or lesbian. Beyond that, gays and lesbians, unlike other minorities, rarely have a support system at home. "A black child goes home and says, 'somebody called me a 'nigger' today and his father says, 'It's horrible that happens in 1996 but here's how I handled it in 1986.' So if they can't get affirmation from their families or their friends, the only other place they can hope to get it is school, which is why it's important for teachers to really think about and be aware of the issue." It was clear that many teachers had not thought about this subject in such concrete terms. "Someone asked, 'What can I really do as a teacher?' and I tried to make the point that everything that a teacher does or says or does not do has an impact. If you let the word 'fag' go unchallenged, you're sending the message it's OK to use that term. You would never let a kid say 'nigger' or 'kike' or 'wop.' When teachers hear 'fag' or 'queer' and don't say anything, it sends a message to a gay kid that 'fag' is bad and to the straight kid that it's OK to use those terms.' Like many in the field, Woog advocates, even more than specific curriculum units like the history of the gay rights movement, that schools build images of gay and lesbian lives into the curriculum as a more natural part of the school day: for example, by sending Jack and Bill to the grocery store not doing a unit on gay poets, rather mentioning, in passing, but not dwelling on the fact that the poet Walt Whitman was a gay man. Also important is using gender-neutral language: Instead of "Do you have a boyfriend?" trying, "Are you

FRIDAY, MAY 31, 1996/THE SCARSDALE INQUIRER/PAGE 21 SHS — taking on the rights and realities of gay students

Treading carefully It was suggested afterwards that teachers who felt they could put a welcome mat out to gay students to encourage openness and try to address their concerns should identify themselves by placing pink triangles on their doors. Some worried what it would look like for teachers who didn't sign on. To distive faculty reaction further and explore further options, Hartman and Collabolletta held a meeting last Monday attended by some 20 teachers, as well as Fox and assistant principal Corwith Hansen. Ideas abounded, Collabolletta said, and he sensed a commitment to move forward, addressing the school culture, figuring out if, how, where and when to bring the subject into the curriculum,

how — or if — kids should be part of 'We want to get the word out to kids that this is an issue we do want to discuss," he said. "We're taking baby steps but we're moving in a direction," he

High School was as part of the "isms" considered during a special program two years ago called "Beyond Fear and

"In the past several years, at the Junior Health Fair, we've looked at stereotyping and sex roles, and within that context sexual orientation has been

Many of today's babies may thank

When does the subject come up?

According to Linda Prendergast, the district health coordinator, the first major institutional effort to look at heterosexism and homophobia in Scarsdale

ing as to the roots of sexuality; "in talking about sex roles and expectations, sometimes we would specially address some of the myths about homosexuality." In a relationship class, the subject of same-sex relationships would definitely arise, issues of same-sex parenting might. In talking about diseases and disorders, behaviors that would lead to HIV and AIDS would be addressed. In assigned project work, a reading list might include homosexuality as a topic students might choose to write about.

curriculum, in a sexuality unit, talking about sexual "orientation," not sexual

"preference;" discussing current think-During a mental health and illness class, when suicide rates among teens is raised, higher rates among gays and lesbian youth might be spoken of. Some, but not all, 10th grade classes see a documentary where kids talk about coming out. "Time is probably the biggest issue regarding whether to show it or not." she explained. "The idea is to discuss sexual orientation in a nonsensationalistic way, to look at our body of knowledge and separate fact from myth as best we know it, with recognition of the wide spectrum of people's understandings and their feelings about homosexuality, hoping to

Scarsdale Inquirer, May 31st, 1996

The first article focused on the difficulty of coming out, especially to parents. The second featured two anonymous recent graduates of Scarsdale High School. Both said they experienced homophobia while students there. They described an atmosphere of "liberal homophobia" where a a facade of acceptance covered a deeper level of discomfort or even disgust. Appropriately, the third article focused on efforts to combat homophobia at the High School, spearheaded by Scarsdale teacher and psychologist Dr. Ernest Collabolletta and Dr. Stephen Hartman, one of the school's youth outreach workers.

all of our lives. It is a part of who we are. Our society assumes that because most of us are heterosexual, everybody is, or should be. Try to imagine the pressure that this simple assumption puts on a gay teen. It is unfair to ask a teenager to lie or hide who he/she is. And it is way too much of a burden to place on a youngster.

Besides, haven't most of us brought our children up to value truth and be

Scarsdale, Edgemont High School

dealt with the subject in a way that enabled our son to "come out" in his senior year in high school, years before many gays feel safe enough to dó so, due to supportive family, teachers, friends, and an administration that invited guest speakers and encouraged open discussion on many "controversial" topics of interest and benefit to teenagers, sexual orientation being just

It is crucial to the mental health and happiness of our teenagers to address

this subject in high school, preferably even earlier. Our communities and our schools have a responsibility to support all of our children, not just some

JUDY GRUEN

Hadden Road

STEVE PIEKARKSKI

We were luckier than most. Unlike honest?

one of them.

of them.

Continued on page 21 boy to 'come out' I do not want to silence Mr. Open discussion To the Editor:

To the Editor:

With reference to the letter from D. Karl Malkames about the offensive language and content of an article by Louise Wollman on May 24, ["SHS taking on the rights and realities of gay students"] the following may be helpful.

promotes growth

Although I respect Mr. Malkames's offense at some of the language "John" used when he was interviewed by Ms. Wollman, John and others in our generation should know that we young people express something emotionally complex by resorting to a

Although Mr. Malkames did not curse in his letter to the editor, I found his reference to John as "abnormal," rather than respecting him as a human being who has needs and abilities like any other, to be disrespectful and offensive.

In response to Mr. Malkames being offended by the content of the article, I highly encourage him, and all those who share his viewpoint, to realize that it is the obligation of a responsible newspaper to report on what is happening to ALL members of the Scarsdale community. The issues of 1 our youth are not issues that can be ignored.

I encourage Mr. Malkames and those that share his view to see that discussing sexuality as a community, 5 and certainly within the high school, incorporates EVERYONE's needs 8 and feelings. Once you break down s the barriers around sexuality, you can create a more relaxed environment in which people aren't trying to live up to a false image.

Malkames's views. In fact, I am glad that he wrote what he did and I personally want to thank him for expressing his views. The only way for a community to grow is to openly discuss issues and work together to deal with them.

> DANNY KATZ Sprague Road Scarsdale Alternative School Alumnus

Reader objects to an expletive

To the Editor:

a subscriber to the Scarsdae Inquirer it has been a comfort to depend upon the good taste of your staff to provide a offensive language currenty accepted by the ultra-liberal media.

My confidence was shaken however to see the expletive printed in our May 24th issue. It was bad enough to see the lengthy article by LouiseWollman dealing with such abnormal people but the foul expression on page 14 quoting "John" should never have been in

Sherwood Place

Throughout the 45 year I have been periodical free from the vugarities and

D. KARL MALKAMES

Scarsdale Inquirer, May 31st, 1996

Sexual preference is an integral part of ALISON GRUEN

Scarsdale Inquirer, June 21st, 1996

Edgemont helped

We would like to thank The

Scarsdale Inquirer and Louise

Wollman for running the wonderful series of articles on the subject of homosexuality. As the parents of a gay teenager we know only too well the pain, rejection, fear and discrimination

these children grew up with and must deal with every day of their lives - things no loving, protective parents in Scarsdale or elsewhere would choose one straight. They are both wonderful, bright, talented, hard-working, compassionate human beings. We are very proud of them both. Both of them deserve the same rights and legal protections as well as the opportunity to lead safe, happy, productive lives

without having to resort to lies or that homosexuality is not a "lifestyle."

Children don't choose to be gay.

What people need to understand is secrecy.

We have two children — one gay,

to have their child experience.

Dislikes stories on homosexuality

To the Editor.

I strongly feel that your recent articles relating to homosexuality should not be in The Scarsdale Inquirer.

> JIM FITZGERALD Brambach Road

Scarsdale Inquirer, June 28, 1996

While most responses to the series of articles were positive, there were two individuals who expressed their disapproval.

Scarsdale Inquirer June 7th, 1996

High school students fight for equality

By AMANDA DiBART When you hear the words "civil rights," what comes to mind? The 1963 March on Washington? Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s "I Have a Dream" speech? Sure, those are all good answers. How about Bayard Rustin? Many people do not know who this important civil rights leader is. He is the man who encouraged King to use nonviolence and civil disobedience in the black civil rights He organized the March on Washington. Yet as Rustin fought for civil rights regardless of the skin color, he faced discrimination within the civil rights movement; as a result, Rustin has been forgotten by textbook history. Bayard Rustin was gay. Just as Rustin fought discrimination against race, groups are now fighting discrimination against his sexual orientation. The civil rights movement for the turn of the century is for the Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender (GLBT) community.

Two years ago a group of high school students formed a club called the Straight and Gay Alliance (SAGA) dedicated to just this cause.

SAGA serves to open discussion among GLBT students and heterosexual students, to educate the Scarsdale community about GLBT issues and to make Scarsdale High School a safer place for everyone regardless of sexual orientation. For a community that prides itself on a great school system, Scarsdale students are surprisingly ignorant about human sexuality. Current estimates are 10 percent of the population is GLBT. Which means that there are GLBT students in the high school, middle school and elementary schools. Likewise, there are GLBT teachers and GLBT members of the community. One cannot choose to be a homosexual any more than one can choose to be a heterosexual. Learning about homosexuality cannot "make" a person suddenly attracted to members of the same sex. Gay men and lesbians constitute families and can have children through various

There are GLBT people of every race, ethnicity, class and religion. Homosexuality is not a disease or a disorder. There is no "cure" for homosexuality, and even if there were, why would anyone want it?

Just as GLBTs exist in Scarsdale, so does homophobia and heterosexism. Last spring SAGA attended a faculty meeting and spoke about the type of experience a GLBT student attending Scarsdale High School has and how the faculty could improve it. Students call each other "fag" or insult activities, clothes, people, objects, books, movies, etc. by calling them "gay," and most teachers do not respond in the same way they would if a student used a racial epithet.

Last summer SAGA put up posters celebrating June as National Pride Month. Most of these posters were torn down and destroyed. One evening an anonymous person or group of people hung signs with homophobic, hateful language that discussed homosexuality in a hurtful, inflammatory and bigoted way. School officials removed most of these signs before school the

The school curriculum is heterosexist. In the books students read, GLBT characters either commit suicide or are murdered in the end, such as in Tennessee Williams' "A Street Car Named Desire." And oftentimes teachers never mention that this is not a healthy way to deal with one's sexuality, thus condoning death. When students read GLBT authors, such as James Baldwin and Shakespeare, teachers never mention the author's sexuality and how it may have affected his/her work. If a person's sexuality is not mentioned, it is assumed to be straight. GLBT figures in history, such as Bayard Rustin and Michael Wigglesworth, a Puritan minister, are role models who are black, and the study of non-European nations.

left out completely. Important events, such as the riot at Stonewall Inn, are likewise ignored. However, the curriculum has been amended to include authors from all ethnicities, historical Members and officers of SAGA have begun a collection of news a new biography of the late transgender jazz musician, Billy Tipton, and SAGA believes that current events are an effective way to include GLBT issues in the curriculum. SAGA officers have spoken with Kelley Hamm, the head of the high school social studies department, and are planning to make this resource available to social studies teachers. SAGA also plans to regarding the GLBT movement. These articles come from magazines, news-

SAGA will have a presentation among the other events of the week, which students may attend. The presentation will discuss how the belief in equality among all people that King pursued is the same belief that the GLBT community is fighting for and how the GLBT has been influenced by the strategies of King's movement. SAGA will also continue to have poster campaigns to educate the school community and encourage participate in the week-long commemoration of King in the high school.

The fight for GLBT students to be protected from homophobia and to be provided with healthy role models is perhaps even more crucial than in other movements. When discrimination acceptance and respect within the student body.

more acceptable, and persons of color were left out of the curriculum, the papers and the Internet and address experience of these students was differtopics such as the brutal murder of ent than that of GLBT students. A Matthew Shepard, the controversial black child could go home each afteradvertisements by so-called "ex-gays," noon and find support in parents who could serve as role models and who had gone through similar experiences. Furthermore, one cannot hide the color of one's skin. However, one can against blacks was more common and

Editor: Sanaa Hyder

hide, at great emotional cost, one's sexuality. A gay student cannot go home and find role models in his parents, and his parents have not experienced what he is experiencing. His parents might not even know that he is gay. They might be homophobic and, if they were to find out that their son was gay, kick him out of the house. A depressed GLBT teen may not know whom to turn to for support. The majority of teen suicides are committed by GLBT

Having a role model such as U.S. Rep Barney Frank as a functioning, successful gay man, could be a great help to a lonely GLBT student. By celebrating the rich history of the GLBT movement and honoring accomplished people, who happen to be GLBT, Scarsdale can not only begin to provide love and support for its GLBT citizens, but also enrich the community as a

Editor's note: The author is a senior at Scarsdale High School.

The Straight and Gay Alliance, a High School club formed in 1996, was featured in a Scarsdale Inquirer article in December, 1998. Posters put up by the group for Pride Month that year were torn down and replaced with homophobic signs.

Scarsdale Inquirer December 11th, 1998

Clergy's dilemma to bless or not to bless homosexual unions

By LINDA LEAVITT

and ILENE NECHAMKIN Organized religions have always regarded marriage as a sacred commitment between a man and a woman. Now a question that in decades past would never have been posed, much less answered, is openly discussed in religious communities: Can a clergyman bless or otherwise sanctify a union between two people of the same sex? Few issues are as divisive and bitterly argued as those concerning sex and reproduction. But in Westchester, many clergymen are wrestling quietly and thoughtfully with the dilemma and coming out on the liberal side.

Presbyterians brought the issue to the fore when a minister in New Windsor, N.Y., asked the Hudson River Presbytery to investigate South Church in Dobbs Ferry, where the Rev. Joseph Gilmore, had officiated at ceremonies celebrating homosexual commitments. After a three-month investigation, the Presbytery, the governing body of 95 churches in seven counties, concluded that both churches had acted in good faith, and that the Rev. Gilmore had been performing samesex union ceremonies, not same-sex

On Jan. 30, the Presbytery voted to allow local churches discretion in performing same-gender "ceremonies of holy union within or outside the confines of the church sanctuary, reflecting our understanding at this time that these ceremonies do not constitute

"We recognize the unique gifts and ministries of both churches," the council of the Hudson River Presbytery wrote in a letter to member churches. "It is our hope that both still value the gifts of the other, and in humility agree to disagree where differences cannot be

The Rev. Donald Steele, minister of Hitchcock Presbyterian Church in Scarsdale, said in an interview Tuesday, "A committed relationship service gives thanks for two people being brought together with tenderness and public acknowledgment that they intend to live together in the presence of God with faith and courage."

Steele said he had not been asked to perform such a ceremony, but if he were, he would sit down with the couple, just as he does with a heterosexual couple, and discuss their feelings and intentions before agreeing to sanctify their relationship. If he decided to perform the ceremony, he would have to get permission from the session, which is the lay governing body of the individual church. The session also gives permission for marriages.

The Rev. Steele said that varying interpretations of scripture often arise from different world views: Some seem to see the world as "a hostile place where everything is going downhill," others as a more "friendly place with either mixed signs or signs of progress." Human beings are continually engaged in a process of trying to make sense of things, the minister said. But rather than hold abstract discussions or categorize people on the basis of their sexual inclinations, "We need to see an individual as a human being in his fullness; created in God's image as we are. Sexuality is part of who we are, but not the total of anyone."

Asked how a commitment ceremony would be different from the marriage ceremony, the Rev. Steele said he wasn't sure: "There are certain words from the marriage ceremony we couldn't use - we'd have to be clear that we were not just saying something Contined on page 14

In March of 1999 the PT Council held a program "Breaking Through the Wall of Silence: A Conversation About Sexual Orientation." Resident Helen Fitzgerald did not approve of the "homosexual activist agenda." Since 1999 this country has seen many victories for LGBTQ+ rights. Gay marriage has been established as a constitutional right by the Supreme Court. Now the rights of trans and non-binary people are on the front lines of the national debate. While the pushback may seem disheartening, reflecting on the gains made since the turn of the century demonstrates that change is possible.

Many local Protestant and Jewish clergy are willing to bless same-sex unions

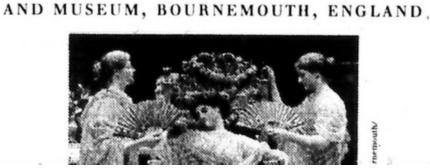

Continued from page 1 to get around the rule that marriage is only between a man and a woman. The bottom line is that while "as a denomination we disagree, we have to deal locally with the individuals who show up," he said. He speculated that the issue of gay unions might be "a call for us to find ways we can have a dialogue. History is full of examples of faith driving a wedge between people. It's high time we learned to talk with each other maybe that's God's gift to challenge us to explore something, to open up. We may have to live in a reality where we don't have consensus, but if we don't push it, growth happens," he said. Another Protestant minister, the Rev

Congregational Church, said that the United Church of Christ had adopted an "open and affirming" view of samesex couples seeking spiritual connections. "It's something we bless." However, Congregationalists differ from Presbyterians in that such decisions are always up to the individual church: "What the church says nationally doesn't bind us," the Rev. Washburn said. "The denomination has a position but there are churches that oppose it." He said gay couples and singles were welcome. The SCC minister said he had never been asked to perform a commitment ceremony for a gay couple but that he had long ago decided that he would.

teenagers any more either."

love for and commitment to each other, bring their families together and help heal the rift that had developed over one partner's divorce. "We worked together on the wording," the Rev. Junod said. "The words were not traditional, but the rubric was.' As for scriptural prohibitions of homosexuality, the Rev. Washburn said, "It is hard to get around Leviticus saying what it says." (18:22: "A man shall not lie with a man as with a woman; it is an abomination.") "I don't know if we can reconcile our position with that," said the Rev.

OFFOT TA+

ent from a marriage ceremony, since the intentions are the same: a life com-

SCC's associate pastor, the Rev.

Elizabeth Junod, performed a service

(not in the local church) for two men who had been together for six years and wanted to publicly display their mitment between two people.

Washburn, "but we don't stone Scriptural injunctions against homosexuality are taken very seriously by the Catholic Church. "A lifelong partnership of a man and a woman is the lesbians to his church and blessed same-sex relationships had recently been removed from the parish and was no longer a priest.

only relationship sanctioned by God's covenant," said Monsignor William

Smith, a well known professor of

is a formal Church teaching that homosexual activity is immoral — the Church cannot bless on the one hand

what it is saying is immoral on the other." Normally, the Church blesses things that it considers either good or

Unlike the Congregationalists and Presbyterians, individual Catholic parishes cannot make their own decisions about sacramental matters, the monsignor said, noting that a priest in Rochester who welcomed gays and

Toll Free:

(877) 337-8311

neutral, the monsignor said.

moral theology who teaches at St. Jews, the Biblical injunction against Joseph's Seminary in Yonkers and homosexual behavior ends all discussays Mass on Sundays at Immaculate sion of the matter. Heart of Mary Church in Scarsdale. "There's no way around [the "We are in the middle of a social Biblical text]," said Rabbi Velvl movement where people have cere-Buttman, executive director of Chabad monies to celebrate friendships," said Lubavitch of Westchester County. the monsignor. "But no priest could "There's nothing left to debate." bless a same-sex involvement without The Torah, or the five books of being spectacularly inconsistent. There Moses, outlines a way of life in which position on the issue.

homosexual activity is strictly proscribed. But the rabbi said a homosexual would be counted in a minyan, a quorum for public prayer, and entitled to receive ritual honors in a service. Other movements take more liberal positions. According to Rabbi Lester Bronstein, spiritual leader of Bet Am Shalom synagogue in White Plains, the National Reconstructionist Movement adopted a statement calling for full recognition and equality in all aspects of ritual life - including marriage and ordination — regardless of gender or

Jews have no uniform, established

For some traditional and Orthodox sexual orientation. Each congregation, though, was not bound by the statement. At Bet Am, a compromise position was effected several years ago, consistent with the perceived comfort level; mitment ceremony," that was not identical to a marriage service. To date, though, Rabbi Bronstein has not been asked to officiate at such a ceremony. The reasoning behind the policies, Rabbi Bronstein said, is a sort of ethical corrective. "It's not a libertarian policy," he said. A blessed, monogamous union essentially eliminates promiscuity which is antithetical to a religious life: "And it's a human rights issue. Two people who are homosexual have the same rights as a heterosexual the congregation would accept a "com-

Rabbi Stephen Klein of Scarsdale Synagogue-Tremont Temple, a Reform congregation, said the movement while recognizing the sanctity of monogamous same-sex unions, did not have an official position on rabbis officiating to consecrate the relationship Such officiation is currently under discussion. "It isn't an official marriage because New York State does not recognize it as such, the rabbi said, adding that "if two homosexuals came to me and said they were in love, and wished to make a monogamous commitment to each other that would be sanctified by the Jewish faith," he would "officiate at some kind of consecration cere-

Scarsdale Inquirer February 19th, 1999

In 1999, local churches and synagogues wrestled with the issue of homosexual unions. Rev. Donald Steele of Hitchcock Presbyterian Church, Rev. Philip Washburn of Scarsdale Congregational Church, and Rabbi Stephen Klein of Scarsdale Synagogue all said they would be willing to perform some form of commitment ceremony, but stressed that it would need to differ from a marriage ceremony. On the other hand, Mon. William Smith of IHM and Rabbi Velvi Buttman of Chabad Lubovitch of Westchester County both said that they could not bless a homosexual union.

Homosexual acts do not fulfill purpose of sex meeting.

To the Editor:

Last night I attended the PT Council Program titled "Breaking Through the Wall of Silence: A Conversation About Sexual Orientation."

During the question-and-answer session I was given a turn to speak. I stated my name and mentioned that I had some thoughts to add to the program. (I had planned to speak for approximately 70 seconds.)

In the middle of my remarks I was interrupted by someone in the audience who said: "Is this a question?" I explained that all the notices I had received announcing this program stated that it was a "community conversation.'

Then a panel member told me that I could not finish my statement because the meeting was running late. I calmly objected, stating that the time for the end of this program was not printed in any of the notices. I was disappointed.

I felt I had a right to contribute to the

Here is the text of the comments I was not able to complete at the PT Council program on March 23.

"My name is Helen Fitzgerald. I would like to add a few thoughts to this program on sexual orientation. My husband and I have always taught our children to treat each person with respect and not to criticize others. We realize that it is our responsibility to teach our children to base their thoughts, words and actions on the

"These are the truths about human sexuality and sexual orientation we give our children. We tell them that ... the twofold purpose of sex is to unify a husband and wife who have made a permanent commitment in marriage and to have children." (Interruption from the audience occurred in the middle of the previous sentence.) "We explain that there is a distinction between being homosexual and doing homosexual genital acts. . Homosexual genital acts are wrong because they are a misuse of sexuality - they do not fulfill the twofold purpose of sex."

> HELEN FITZGERALD Brambach Road

Letters continued on next page

Homosexual activist agenda must be fought

To the Editor: The March 23 Scarsdale PT Council program, "Breaking Through the Wall of Silence" was definitely not a "conversation." It was "indoctrination"! The statements by the keynote speaker, Kate Frankfurt, of the Gay, Lesbian and Straight Education Network (GLSEN) and the entire panel left me with the clear impression that respect for homosexual students is just a small part of a much broader agenda. Make no mistake about it, homosexual activists are waging a vigorous campaign to affirm homosexuality in young people and to legalize "gay marriage." In 1996 the Family Research Council published the presentation titled "Homosexual Correctness - Advances in America's Schools" by Peter LaBarbera, the executive director of Accuracy in Academia and a former national correspondent for the Washington Times. In this presentation Mr. LaBarbera stated that "gay educators and their allies are promoting a variety of strategies to accomplish-their goal of normalizing homosexuality.

Among them: · Promoting 'safe schools.' This cunning strategy relies heavily on winning sympathy for gay youth as a besieged victim group in schools. Promoting the celebration of Gay

History Month in schools to provide . students with positive homosexual role

· Creating 'gay-straight' youth alliances in high schools, which frequently become conduits for pro-homosexual propagandizing to student bod-

The co-presidents of the Scarsdale High School Student and Gay Alliance Club (SAGA) were on the panel at the March 23 PT Council program.

agree wholeheartedly with LaBarbera's admonition: "Homosexual activists are deadly serious about using the education process to teach kids that homosexuality is OK, and that anyone who thinks otherwise is a 'bigot'. If parents are not vigilant in ferreting out such propaganda and countering it, they will witness the rise of a generation hostile to five millennia of Judeo-Christian teaching proscribing homosexual behavior."

> HELEN FITZGERALD Brambach Road

Scarsdale Inquirer April 23rd, 1999